Information About U.S. Export Control Requirements

Dear Valued Customer,

Thank you for your continued business with Entegris. We are sharing general information about U.S. export control rules that apply to some Entegris products. We are sending this information to customers worldwide.

What these rules are. The United States controls the export of certain products, software, and technology. The U.S. Department of Commerce, Bureau of Industry and Security, administers these controls through the Export Administration Regulations (the "EAR"). Entegris, Inc. and its subsidiaries and affiliates (collectively, "Entegris") are committed to compliance with all applicable laws in the jurisdictions where we operate, including these rules.

When these rules may apply. These rules always apply to products exported from the United States, wherever they were made. They also always apply to U.S.-origin products, wherever they are located and whatever their classification. This includes U.S.-origin products that a customer buys outside the United States, for example from a distributor or warehouse in another country. In some cases, these rules apply to certain products made outside the United States, for example when a product contains more than a certain amount of controlled U.S.-origin content, or is made with certain U.S. technology, software, or equipment. When these rules apply, a customer may need a U.S. government license before it ships the product to another country or sells or transfers it to another party in the same country. This also applies if the customer changes how it uses the product. Whether a license is needed depends on the product and its classification, the destination, the recipient, the intended use, and the other parties involved. A license may be required even for products that are not on the U.S. Commerce Control List (designated "EAR99"), if the product is going to a restricted country, recipient, or use.

Your Role as a Customer. Each customer is responsible for complying with the export control laws that apply to its activities, including the rules described in this notice where they apply, and for maintaining compliance procedures appropriate to its role in the supply chain. This includes when a customer resells, distributes, or otherwise transfers Entegris products. Entegris expects customers not to divert these products. This means not reselling or transferring them, directly or through others, to a restricted country, recipient, or use without any license or other authorization these rules require. If a customer has information that suggests a product may go to a restricted country, recipient or use, Entegris expects the customer to review the transaction carefully and resolve any concern before it sells or transfers the product. From time to time, Entegris may ask for information it needs to meet the export control requirements that apply to a transaction, such as the destination or intended use of a product.

How we can help. If you have questions about these rules, or would like to know how a specific Entegris product is classified under them, please contact our team at us_tradecompliance_requests@entegris.com. Please include the Entegris part number where relevant.

This notice provides general information. It does not change any agreement with Entegris. If this notice is translated, the English version controls. Thank you for your attention to this matter.
